Administrative History Note

The Center for the Study of Man was established on July 1, 1968, as a bureau-level organization of the Smithsonian Institution. Its beginning was precluded by the appointment in 1965 of the Chicago-based anthropologist Sol Tax as special advisor in anthropology to the Secretary of the Smithsonian. Tax was to assist with the reorientation of anthropology at the Smithsonian and cooperation between him and the staff of the Smithsonian Office of Anthropology (now the Department of Anthropology) created several special programs, some of which were transferred to the center upon its inception. Tax was the center's first director. Samuel Leonard Stanley, formerly project coordinator for the Office of Anthropology, became the program coordinator for the center and was in charge of day-to-day operations. Priscilla Reining was appointed coordinator for urgent anthropology. In addition to such staff, the center consisted of an advisory board (sometimes referred to as "members") drawn from the international community of anthropologists.

Essentially, the center's concern was the application of anthropological knowledge to phenomena conceived as problems that confront mankind as a whole. It aimed to promote and coordinate study of these, mainly through the organization of special programs for meetings of established anthropological groups and by bringing together into special task forces researchers interested in the problems.

The center also included several special programs. Although each of these had considerable independence, all can be seen as subsumed under its broad and ultimate purposes. Thus, the compilation of a computer-based directory of anthropologists and the compilation of bibliographies of anthropological literature were facilitative efforts. An Urgent Anthropology Program, originally initiated in the Office of Anthropology following an international conference in Washington, D. C., in 1966, served to gather data essential to the more practical main purposes of the program as well as to produce studies of general anthropological interest.

The support given such studies was in the form of small grants to allow field work in cultures that were rapidly changing under the pressure of modernization. Similarly, data were gathered and special studies carried out by the Research Institute on Immigration and Ethnic Studies, added to the center in 1974 under the direction of Roy S. Bryce LaPorte, and the National Anthropological Film Center, an outgrowth of a program of the National Institutes of Health which was transferred to the Smithsonian in 1975 and incorporated in the center in 1977. An American Indian Program consisted of two parts. First, the compilation of a new multivolume Handbook of North American Indians under the general editorship of William C. Sturtevant was another project taken over from the Office of Anthropology. Second, action anthropology projects were undertaken with various Indian groups.

The center was one of several efforts of the Smithsonian to create research units to deal with broad problems of contemporary interest. Their success depended on two contingencies: first, funding would become available once the units were launched and, second, the traditional individualistic research of the Smithsonian staff could be continued or redirected--but somehow incorporated under the board goals of the new units. When both assumptions proved difficult to realize, the new programs were terminated or limited. Thus, beginning in 1976, the center was slowly phased out. In that year, Stanley was transferred from the center to the staff of the director of the National Museum of Natural History. At the same time, Tax's service as the Center's director came to an end; the handbook was transferred to the National Museum of Natural History; and the Urgent Anthropology Program was returned to the museum's Department of Anthropology. The center thus became the Institute on Immigration and Ethnic Studies and the National Research Film Center. In 1982, the Film Center was divided and the research was placed under one director and the archives, designated the Human Studies Film Archives, under Director Herman Joseph Viola, who was at the same time the director of the National Anthropological Archives. The center was abolished in 1983 and only the film archives, assigned to the Department of Anthropology, survived from the center.

Scope and Content Note

The records are mainly those of by Program Coordinator Samuel L. Stanley, the CSM administrative officer, and the Institute for Immigration and Ethnic Studies. Especially well documented are several international CSM-sponsored conferences, including a planning meeting in Cairo in 1972, several pre-session conferences (on cannabis, alcohol, population, and the transmission of culture) at the Ninth International Congress of Anthropological and Ethnological Sciences at Chicago in 1973, and a 1974 meeting at Bucharest on the cultural implications of population change. Other records relating to cross-cultural studies include those concerning an abortive attempt to issue a series of monographs and the organization of special task forces concerned with questions of human fertility and the environment. The records also include material about the action anthropology projects with Indians with which Stanley was directly concerned. These focused on economic development and include material relating to the coordination of studies of specific tribes carried out with funds from the Economic Development Administration and on Stanley's economic development consulting for the American Indian Policy Review Commission. In addition, there are a few files that Stanley created for general information and material relating to his earlier teaching career. Although some materials concerning these programs are housekeeping records, many letters, notes, and statements concern policy and procedure. For some conferences, there are scholarly papers and transcripts. Many files, especially those of an informational nature, include considerable amounts of printed and processed material. The collection also contains the papers of Wesley White.

With some CSM programs, Stanley's relationship was apparently formal instead of directly active. There is, for example, little documentation among his records that relates to the CSM's film center and less about the immigration and ethnic studies among his materials. Most material pertinent to these units are among the administrative officer's records.

Processing Note

This collection has not been processed. Series were imposed to aid the navigation of this inventory and simply represent topics of any apparent groupings of materials in the collection. Groups of unrelated materials were combined to form Series 38.

Miscellaneous Correspondence, Reports, Publications. It should be noted that this series contains materials relating to the other series in the collection.
